Grateful Parents Raise Grateful Kids by Dr. Jen, The Umbrella Project

Gratitude takes practice!!! The more children practice gratitude, the more likely they are to build and use this important skill. One significant way to build this part of our child's umbrella is to practice gratitude ourselves. The more grateful we are as parents, the more opportunities we will naturally put in front of our children to practice gratitude. If gratitude is a skill in your umbrella that could use a little more practice that's okay. We all have strong coping skills and skills that could use some nurturing and practice. Set the intention to find more opportunities to express your own gratitude. By doing this, you will create more chances for your child to practice too. Unsure about your coping strengths and which umbrella holes you could work on? Complete your own umbrella assessment to get a picture of your umbrella. Wellbeing is a family journey and in my experience, children respond and participate best when the whole family is working towards bigger umbrellas.
